A Cure for Intemperance. Lawyer Bichard Randall was recently visited by Mr. James Bracken, the wife of an intemperatemsn. The Brackens reside at North Paterson, N. J. James Bracken bardly everdeigned to earn a penny, but was always ready to take his wife's earnings. Mrs. Bracken on Friday decided to consult Lawyer Randall.

"Does your husband come home intoxicated very often, Mrs. Bracken?' asked the lawver. "Yes sir; he is drunk nearly every day and I am bothered to death by him." "You say you don't wish him sent to jali?"

"Yes, that is what I said. If you can get him to take the pledge and scare him by threatening to put him in prison he may stop drinking."

The lawyer looked rather puzzled for a few minutes, but soon a bright smile over-spread his countenance.

"I have it?" he exclaimed. "Now, Mrs. "I have!!?" he exclaimed. "Now, Mrs. Bracken, I'il tell you what to do to cure your husband of his obnoxious habit. You know what poison ivy is, don't you?" "Yes, sir; but what has that to do with the liquor my husband drinks?" "You go home and collect a quantity of poison ivy, and when your husband gets drunk again, before he lies down, you place some of it in his bad."

On the day after this solvice was given James Bracken numbled into his home. Mrs. Bracken went back of the house and secured the ivy and want back of the house and secured the ivy and scattered it in her husband's bcl. He discobed, and, being too drunk to notice the small green leaves, rolled over and was soon tossing about. After he had lain on the poison vines for several hours he arose and walked the floor. While he was doing that his wife slipped into the room and removed the ivy from the bed. Going out Bracken drank a little and then came home sgair, went to bed and slept until morning. When he arose and beheld himself in a looking lass he was a pretty sight. His hands and face were swollen and beneid himself in a looking case is was a pretty sight. His hands and face were swollen from the effects of the poison, but he attributed it all to the bad rum he had been imbibing. His wife knew that no danger would result from the try, and she agreed with him that he was becoming terribly bleated. Bracken became a armed and swore he would never drink another drop of the state of the properties with the was strength and the properties. llquor. In the meantime Mrs. Bracken had been treating her husband, and the swelling and other

The man has not asked for liquor for three days, which is a mothing boussa'. He is theroughly convinced that the abnormal size of his face, limbs and body was caused by the rum he drank.
